Source C: © Richard I (1999), page 3, John Gillingham, Yale University Press.

SOURCE B: based on a modern historian using a contemporary document to examine the way in which Richard was seen soon after his death

Indeed, some chroniclers pointed out Richard's shortcomings in promoting his subjects' well-being, and they hint at mounting unhappiness over his money gathering. William of Newburgh, remembering Richard's early actions before his departure on crusade, judged them irresponsible and compared him unfavourably with Henry II. Ralph of Coggeshall, another contemporary, wrote, 'No age can remember, no history can record any preceding [earlier] king who exacted [took] and received so much money from his kingdom as that king exacted and collected in the five years after he returned from captivity.'

SOURCE C: from a modern historian's study of Richard I

What matters here is, above all, Richard's commitment to the crusades. English historians who have judged him harshly have tended to do so on the grounds that his enthusiasm for the crusade led him to neglect his kingdom; ... Those who in the past compared him to Alexander, Augustus, Charlemagne and King Arthur did so because he led a crusade. It was the Third Crusade, his crusade, which made him famous throughout the world of Latin Christianity, and in Islam too.

SOURCE A: a picture of the landing of William III at Torbay in November 1688

SOURCE B: taken from a modern history book about James II and the Glorious Revolution

James should have been able to cope with the invasion, provided that his soldiers and sailors would fight. William had often been assured that they would not and there was much evidence to support this claim. In July there had almost been a mutiny in the fleet when a Catholic captain had had Mass said on his ship. As for the army, the soldiers had cheered at the bishops’ acquittal. In the last months of 1688, there were rumours of the arrival of French or Irish troops, of Popish murders and massacres, which placed a greater strain on the fragile loyalty of James’s soldiers. [On the other hand] William stressed that he had been invited to invade and that his sole aim was ‘to have a free and lawful Parliament assembled as soon as possible’.

SOURCE C: based on a modern history book

William [of Orange] was fortunate that, at the moment of confrontation, James lost his nerve. Though weakened by nosebleeds and sleeplessness, the King made haste to join his army on Salisbury Plain – only to return abruptly to London, where he discovered that his daughter Anne had deserted and joined the cause of her sister and brother-in-law ... Having sent the Queen and the Prince of Wales ahead of him, he fled Whitehall on 11 December ...

SOURCE A: Britannia slays Indian mutineers while protecting the women and children; published in Punch Magazine, 2 September 1857

![Image of Britannia slaying mutineers]

SOURCE B: a modern British historian describes what happened at Cawnpore

Nana Sahib ordered all the remaining British prisoners to be killed. A party of sepoys was ordered to kill 210 women and children. The victims were dragged out and thrown down a well. Some sepoys claimed that some of the children who were still alive were killed first, others were thrown in (alive). It was this atrocity that inflamed British feelings and Brigadier-General James Neill stated that every rebel caught was guilty and should be hanged. They were forced to eat beef (if Hindu) or pork (if Muslim) — something they considered unholy. Some of the Muslim sepoys were sewn into pig skins before being hanged. The idea was to humiliate the religious victims and prevent any reward they might have expected in the afterlife. After that, the rebels would be hanged and then buried in a ditch at the roadside.

SOURCE C: taken from a contemporary account by a British officer

In the compound stands a tree, marked with bullet holes and sword gashes; in the latter is still long hair; amongst the grass and bushes of the compound, between the house and the well, are still strips of clothing and locks of long hair; into that well upwards of 200 bodies of women and children were thrown, many still alive. No one who has seen that spot can ever feel anything but deep hatred to the Nana and his fellow fiends and all his fellow race.
